He bobbed up again on Christmas D y, when he was complainant against a woman named Katherine Crandali, whom he charged with stealing money from him. His case was too filmsy to hold even in a police court and the Crandali woman was discharged.

Since then Harrigan's abode and his movements have been a secret locked in the breasts of his family and himself.

Meanwhile Florence Clarke had been steadily improving in health, and returned to this country. One day she saw Harrigan acting as conductor on a Broadway cable-car. But he saw her first, and when Detectives Frice and McCafferty went to the Company to fince the next day Harrigan had resigned, and no one knew where he could be found.

As Harrigan knew Price, the work of finding him devolved on Detective McCafferty, Harrigan has a brother named William, who keeps a little barber-shop at 995 Seventh avenue, and McCafferty took to going there for his hair-cuts and shaves. He gradually got to be on the folliest terms with the barber, but the latter refused to make any reference to his brother, and McCafferty could find no excuse for dragging in Luke's name.

From that the conversation led to the Wild West Show, soon to open in Brooklyn and McCafferty said ensually:

"By the way, if you were a large man I could get you a fob with Buffalo Bill. He's a great friend of mine."

"I have a friend who's been out of work for some time, and I think he would like such a job," replied the barber. "Well—if he was dark he could be a "fake' Indian," suggested McCafferty.

"He isn't. He's tail and fair, and a broth of a boy," said the barber, "and he sits a horse like a jockey." Then he described Luke.

McArdie, who sat near the wall, stopped watching Donnelly, who was beside Lawyer Severance, on the opposite side of the room, long enough to giance at the bit of battered lead and shiver. I Lawyer Green told of the excitement which attended the shooting, and was vexused. David H. Freedman, McArdle's private secretary, took his place.

Freedman is the man who, McArdle's says, saved his life, and thereby has incurred the latter's life-long gratitude.

Mr. Freedman hav pompadour hair, a curly black mustache and had a headight diamond in his shirt front.

The witness rehearsed the events of the shooting. He said he and McArdle and the latter's son, Steve, had just got up to leave the court-room, when he saw Donnelly put his hand in the side pocket of his sack coat.

"The next instant," continued Freedman, "I was looking at a big revolved in the hands of Donnelly, pointed right square at Mr. McArdle. I jumped for him and caught hold of Donnelly shout the same time that Mr. Severance did. I gripped the pistol so hard that it cut my hand."

While Freedman was testifying, McArdle got up and whispered something to Justice Martin.

The latter interrupted the examination
